Background

In the past decade, skill shortages have become a subject of considerable attention for industry, government and the general public. Trends such as global communication, increased use of new technologies and the emergence of new knowledge-based economies mean work must be approached in different ways. There is a requirement for workers to have higher skills and education, and at the same time, we have an aging population, accompanying slower labour force growth, and greater competition for labour. In addition to these global considerations, Alberta faces immediate challenges in that it has a strong energy economy with investment at an all-time high. Combined, these factors raise increasing concerns around skill shortages in Alberta.

What are skill shortages?

There are many interpretations of what is meant by skill shortages. Generally, a shortage is a situation where employers have difficulties finding qualified workers to fill available positions. Skill shortages occur when the demand for workers with specific skills exceeds the supply at existing market conditions, including current wages and locations.

Shortages may be economy-wide or may be limited to particular occupations or skill sets. If they are economy-wide, they may be local in scope or may be province-wide, nation-wide or even global. The current shortages in health professions, including doctors and nurses, are examples of global shortages. Shortages may be occupation-based, reflecting imbalances in the number of workers available in given occupations; or they may be skill-based, reflecting changing skill requirements within occupations.

To add to the mix, shortages may be seasonal, cyclical or structural. Structural factors include an aging population, changes in consumer tastes, technology changes, and institutional changes (i.e. changes in wage contracts or government legislation).

Canada's aging population - almost one-third of Canadians today are baby boomers born between 1947 and 1966 - is often cited as key structural evidence that labour shortages will become more apparent over the next decade, as boomers move into retirement.

What evidence is there of skill shortages in Alberta?

In Alberta, employers raise skill shortages as an issue and report recruitment challenges in key sectors due to shortages of suitably skilled, qualified, and experienced people in the labour market. According to the 2003 Alberta Wage and Salary Survey, approximately 51 per cent of employers indicated a hiring difficulty over the past two years and 21 per cent have at least one position unfilled for over four months. In 2004, 24 of the 53 occupational classifications had unemployment rates of less than three per cent, indicating a skill shortage. Alberta's economy showed continued growth in 2004, with 40,000 new jobs created and at 4.6%, the lowest provincial unemployment rate in Canada. While evidence suggests we are not experiencing widespread labour shortages, shortages are emerging in specific occupations and in specific areas of the province.

What is being done about skill shortages?

From studies and forums held with employers and industry on this issue over the past year, common themes that have emerged include the need for an integrated government approach to labour force development and the need for increased communication among stakeholders and with Albertans. To provide an understanding of activities already in place to address skill shortages, Human Resources and Employment (HRE) asked government departments attending Labour Force Planning Committee sessions to provide information on their major responsibilities and current or approved activities related to skill shortages. Fourteen departments submitted the information included in this inventory.

Understanding and addressing existing and future potential shortages is a multi-faceted challenge, with no one solution. Our challenge is for stakeholders, including employers, industry, training providers and government, to work together to find the commitment, resources and organization needed to take action on a number of fronts simultaneously.
